Does Humanity Include Our Regulars?

In the peroration to his speech acceptance President Wilson spoke of a time in the indefinite future when the world at large would look upon this nation as "a people who, though keen to succeed, seek always to be at once generous and just, and to whom humanity is dearer than profit or selfish power." Early Opening of the Theatres.

Various causes combined to comvince the theatre managers that it would be the part of wisdom to open their theatres earlier than usual. August occasionally brought in some of the dramatic novelties, but the greater seasons on or about Labor Day. There has been since the middle of August of this year scarcely a night which perity would await them in the last month of summer.

The presence of an unusually large number of visitors to the city was the principal reason for this sanguine feeling on the part of the entrepreneurs. The lack of opportunity for European travel has kept in New York many who would not ordinarily be here. Making their holidays in the was to sample a cooked dish with a metropolis, it was supposed they would be eager for the pleasures of the theatre. The premature beginning of the dramatic season was the not turn black. The believer did. result of this reasoning.

So far there have not been put be to last after Thanksgiving. As to the possibility that any of the present performances may be witnessed after Christmas there cannot be the slightest hope in the mind of the most optimistic impresario. Already four of the productions arranged for the August audiences have been removed from the gaze of the public.

The visitors have indeed given evidence of possessing an independence of judgment which is not to be influenced by the managers. Just because the theatres had prepared new plays for their entertainment the strangers did not in the least feel that it was their duty to go to them. Indeed, they showed greater perverseness in the matter of selecting their amusements and went to see the pieces they had heard well of. In consequence the two summer musical spectacles and one play which has proved its popularity by a long run are attracting much more patronage than any of the new pieces. The public does not have to be of New York necessarily to find out what it wants to see and what is worth see ing. Future dramatic seasons should profit by this manifestation of independent judgment, and managers will probably cease to think that the visitors will go into any playhouse just way about the numerous playhouses partment of said exchange. which seek to attract their patronage. is not
